

Truly the essence is ~~as what a~~ what a thing does, but the essence of what a thing does is unknown to us even though we are able to describe its approximate consequences (upon us). To these consequences we give a proximate response, but we do not know the essence of that response (nor the essence of that to which we are responding. If we did, the manner in which we respond would certainly be different.